"Who grants me permission to love you? / I do not know. / For love is a flame that burns without permission. / It is the heart that dictates, not the mind."

As the poem progresses, Trilussa explores the transformative nature of love. He describes how love can ignite a fire in one's soul, making the heart feel both vulnerable and invincible.

"Love is a sweet madness that makes me tremble / And yet, it gives me strength I never had before. / It is a constant companion, a guiding light / That leads me astray and yet, brings me closer to myself."

In the final stanza, Trilussa concludes by acknowledging the potential risks and rewards of love. He recognizes that love can bring both joy and pain, but he ultimately embraces it as a necessary and fulfilling experience.

"I ask for no permission. / Love has already given me its leave. / May it burn with eternal flame, / Whether it brings me bliss or pain."
