The Pitt Poetry Series, established in 1965 by the University of Pittsburgh Press, is one of the most prestigious and long-running poetry series in the United States. Over the past half century, the series has published groundbreaking works by both established and emerging poets, including six Pulitzer Prize winners and three National Book Award winners.

A Commitment to Literary Excellence

From its inception, the Pitt Poetry Series has been committed to publishing the highest quality poetry, regardless of genre, style, or school. The series' editors have sought out poets whose work is both challenging and accessible, innovative and enduring. As a result, the Pitt Poetry Series has published some of the most important and influential poetry of our time.

A Track Record of Success

The Pitt Poetry Series has a long and distinguished track record of success. Six books published by the series have won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, including works by Galway Kinnell, W.S. Merwin, and A.E. Stallings. Three books published by the series have won the National Book Award for Poetry, including works by Carolyn Kizer, Philip Levine, and Frank Bidart.

A Diverse and Inclusive Series

The Pitt Poetry Series has always been committed to publishing a diverse and inclusive range of voices. The series has published poets from all backgrounds, including women, people of color, and LGBTQ+ poets. In recent years, the series has made a concerted effort to publish more poets from underrepresented groups.

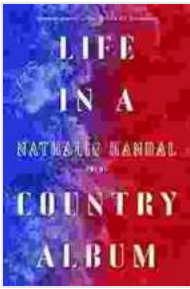

A Legacy of Innovation

The Pitt Poetry Series has a long history of innovation. The series was one of the first to publish books by poets from outside the United States. The series was also one of the first to publish books by women poets. In recent years, the series has begun to publish books by poets who work in new and experimental forms.

A Vital Part of the Literary Landscape

The Pitt Poetry Series is a vital part of the literary landscape. The series publishes some of the most important and influential poetry of our time. The series also provides a platform for emerging poets to reach a wider audience. The Pitt Poetry Series is a testament to the power of poetry to change lives and inspire generations.
