Gaddafi's haikus were published in 2008, under the title "Ode to Tripoli." The book contained 12 haikus, each of which offered a brief glimpse into Gaddafi's mind. The haikus were written in Arabic, but they have been translated into English by a number of scholars.

The haikus cover a wide range of topics, from love and nature to politics and war. In one haiku, Gaddafi writes about the beauty of the Libyan desert:

The vast Libyan desert A sea of sand and sky A place of peace and reflection

In another haiku, he reflects on the power of love:

Love is a powerful force It can conquer all obstacles It can make the wo

However, Gaddafi's haikus also reveal his darker side. In one haiku, he writes about the need for violence in order to achieve political goals:

To achieve our goals We must be willing to fight Even if it means bloods

Gaddafi's haikus have been the subject of much debate. Some critics have dismissed them as mere propaganda, while others have praised them for their beauty and insight. Regardless of one's opinion of Gaddafi, his haikus offer a unique glimpse into the mind of a complex and controversial figure.

Here are the 12 haikus of Muammar Al Gaddafi:

Gaddafi's haikus offer a unique glimpse into the mind of a complex and controversial figure. They reveal his love of his country, his pride in his heritage, and his determination to fight for his beliefs. However, they also reveal his darker side, his willingness to use violence to achieve his goals, and his hatred of the West.

Gaddafi's haikus are a reminder that even the most powerful and ruthless of leaders are human beings. They have their own dreams, fears, and aspirations. And they are capable of both great good and great evil.
